

Fired Manager Sues Burger King for HIV Discrimination

May 9, 2012

A former Burger King manager has filed a lawsuit in federal court claiming the fast-food company fired him because he has HIV, The Huffington Post reports. Christopher Pena, a seven-year staffer, said the company let him go after he disclosed his status to a supervisor and that the dismissal violates the Americans with Disabilities Act. Though he originally struggled with his decision to disclose, Pena ultimately decided to tell his supervisor in case he needed time off from work for health-related reasons. Three months later, he was fired for allegedly poor work performance though Pena claimed he had never before been disciplined or warned. Burger King has not yet filed a response in court to Pena's claim.
