On Sunday, October 13, AIDS Walk Los Angeles will mark its 40th year raising funds to support health programs fighting HIV and AIDS throughout Los Angeles County. Taking a cue from Kamala Harris's presidential campaign, the future-facing theme of this year's AIDS Walk is "We're Not Walking Back!"

Organized by leading LGBTQ health care nonprofit APLA Health, the annual walk aims to support underserved communities living with or at risk for HIV and AIDS and fight for health equity. This year's walk will take place at West Hollywood Park.

“Our 40th AIDS Walk Los Angeles is not only a testament to the unwavering dedication of our community but also a powerful statement of our collective resolve,” said APLA Health’s CEO, Craig E. Thompson, in a press release. “As we embrace this year’s theme, we reaffirm our commitment to eradicating HIV/AIDS and to continuing the vital work that has impacted so many lives over the past four decades.”

Those who wish to participate can form teams or register individually to raise funds for APLA Health, which boosts awareness about the need for better LGBTQ health care and offers HIV specialty care, food, housing and more to underserved communities.

AIDS Walk LA began as a protest march nearly 40 years ago when a group of fed-up activists, patients and friends put their soles on the line to shake the government into action during the AIDS crisis. It was the first walk to fight HIV and AIDS, and it happened on the streets of Los Angeles.

Since that first walk in 1985, hundreds of thousands of walkers and their supporters have raised more than $93 million to combat HIV and AIDS. These funds help sustain APLA Health’s programs and services, which benefit more than 19,000 individuals living in Los Angeles County.

Teams of all sizes are welcome. Schools, companies, LGBTQ+-friendly religious institutions, friends and families have all walked in the past, some in memory of loved ones or in support of friends or family with HIV and/or AIDS.

Last year, AIDS Walk LA surpassed its goal by raising and donating $1.275 million.
