Spearheaded by GMHC \(originally Gay Men's Health Crisis\), the annual AIDS Walk in Central Park has raised more than $170 million since 1986 for GMHC's services, including health, housing, workforce development and more, according to the nonprofit. Donations can be made through June 12 at aidswalknyc.org.

John Elliott of CBS News was on hand to interview folks throughout about the event—you can watch those segments on YouTube and in the video below:

"The epidemic is not over. More than 132,000 New Yorkers are living with HIV, and new infections rose 17% last year," said GMHC co-CEO and chief financial officer Michael Hester in a statement. "But this community is unstoppable—it has survived everything thrown at it. Every dollar raised today connects someone to compassionate care that might literally save their life. GMHC was built for this moment—and today, this community proved it."

CBS also interviewed GMHC co-founder Lawrence Mass, MD, about the early days of the epidemic and the AIDS service organization:

This year's event was presented by ViiV Healthcare, a pharmaceutical company focused on HIV. Additional participants included celebrities Peppermint, Jenifer Lewis and Megan Hilty and elected officials and city leaders, such as New York City Council Speaker Julie Menin, Manhattan Borough President Brad Hoylman-Sigal, and the city's health commissioner, Alister Martin, MD, MPP.
